JUSTIFICATION: Southeast Alaska wild king salmon stocks continue to be in a period of low production. Southeast Alaska king salmon escapements observed from 2016 to 2020 included levels below the lower bounds of escapement goals for many of the 11 monitored king salmon indicator systems. The numbers of king salmon indicator stocks meeting escapement goals from 2016 to 2020 were three (2016), two (2017), four (2018), seven (2019) and six (2020). Despite better performance in 2020, the trend of low production is expected to continue in 2021 for many of the 11 monitored systems, including the Unuk, Taku, Stikine, and Chilkat River stocks which are projected to have escapements below the lower bound of the escapement goal ranges for these systems. The Chilkat River stock has not achieved its escapement goal in six of the past nine years, the King Salmon River stock has not achieved its escapement goal in seven of the past nine years, and the Unuk River stock has not achieved its escapement goal in six of the past nine years. During the 2017/2018 Alaska Board of Fisheries cycle these stocks were identified as stocks of concern prompting the development of specific action plans that outline conservative management measures for all fisheries to reduce the harvest of these stocks. The Taku and Stikine River stocks have not achieved the lower bound of escapement goals in each of the last five years. In accordance with the Pacific Salmon Treaty, restrictive action has been implemented in the terminal areas of the Taku (District 11) and Stikine River (District 8). This emergency order implements the conservative management measures outlined in the king salmon action plans for the sport fishery and, additional conservative management measures to reduce harvest of all wild Southeast Alaska king salmon stocks that are in a period of low production.
